Estimates from the World Health Organization (WHO) show a continuous increase in prevalence and cost of respiratory diseases, which have become the second leading cause of disability in Western nations.

However health authorities, healthcare professionals and the public opinion are still not fully aware of the health and social impact of these diseases. Since the Eighties several large surveys on respiratory health have been performed on the European and Italian general population. They have largely contributed to our disease knowledge, but their results are still largely unknown to non-specialist audiences. Disseminating previously acquired epidemiological knowledge and promoting innovative studies on the general population are essential to properly allocate health resources, to evaluate the efficacy and safety of treatments in daily life, and to prevent most serious consequences of respiratory diseases.

For this reason, the scientific societies of Medical Statistics and Clinical Epidemiology, Pulmonology, Epidemiology, Allergology and Pediatrics have jointly organized the Workshop "Large scale population-based surveys on respiratory health in Italy and Europe" to be held on 23rd-24th October in Verona, Italy.

The Workshop is aimed at presenting the design and the main results from the largest worldwide epidemiological collaborative research projects, undertaken in the last years to investigate respiratory health in children and adults. The European and Italian principal investigators, directly involved in these surveys, will illustrate their findings on the main determinants of respiratory diseases, disease evolution with time and socio-economic burden. The Workshop will offer a unique opportunity to scientists, pneumologists, allergologists, pediatricians and other health professionals to get an overview of the most advanced ongoing researches in respiratory epidemiology, to debate some crucial topics for the validity of the data and models used, and to discuss how to deal with the future challenges of the research on respiratory health.
